Welcome

All dentists, including your general dentist, received training in endodontic treatment in dental school. General dentists can perform root canal procedures along with other dental procedures, but often they refer patients needing endodontic treatment to an endodontist, who is a valuable partner on your general dentist's team of trusted caregivers.

An endodontist is a dentist who specializes in saving teeth. Endodontists become specialists by completing dental school, followed by an additional two or more years of advanced training that includes the diagnosis and treatment of dental pain. They perform routine, as well as difficult and very complex root canal procedures, including endodontic surgery and treatment of traumatic dental injuries.

Endodontists often utilize state-of-the-art technology such as operating microscopes and ultrasonic instrumentation while performing root canal treatment. Advanced technologies, together with specialized techniques, give endodontists a very accurate view of the tooth, and allow them to treat the tooth quickly and comfortably.
